AMUSEMENTS

With a cast of but five characters, Langdon McCormick, whose three-act drama, "The Storm," was presented for the first time to the public, at the National Theater yesterday, has produced a play of great strength and interest, even though there may be a divergence of opinion as to its morals and climax. It deals with the elemental passion of humanity through two men, one repre-senting the untutored man of nature and the other the product of civilization, with a simple girl of the far northwest, whose innocence has been so well guarded by her father throughout her life that man to her is an unknown quantity, as the arbiter of the argument. To one who followed closely the lines and action of the play its contention seemed to tend to the barbaric, notwithstanding a slight concession to the conventional in the climax, which did not measure up to the standard of the remainder of the play. The love which elevates and of which the poets have sung their sweetest melodies had no place in the drama. A fierce contention for the bodily possession of an innocent girl, in a snowbound cabin in the far north, by two men, both declaring their love for her, the one using the artifices and arguments of the civilized man, the other the brute force and persistence of the man who looked only to instinct for the voice of that God which nature had im-perfectly revealed to him in the great silence of a virgin country, yet both tending irresistibly to the same end, makes the plot of the story and the incentive for every situation. While the play may be said to belong to the class that includes "The Barrier," "The Wolf" and similar productions, yet it is unique in its way and of impressive strength withal. Muriel Starr, as Mannette Fachard, the girl of the play, gave a splendid interpretation of the role, which throughout was difficult and exacting. As a character portrayal her work will stand as a chef 'oeuvre of artistic excellence. Robert T. Haines, as Burr Winton, the primal man, who was deaf to the arguments of civilization and knew only that he loved the girl because he wanted her with an unutterable longing that would not brook resistance, was forceful, consistent and effective in every demand. His interpretation gained in strength by its quiet methods even throughout the most intense situations. So, too, may be said of Conway Tearle's portrayal of David Stewart, the man of the east, who, with all its traditions of the higher and better life and love, fell a victim to the "barbarism of nature" and developed "the yellow streak" in his eagerness to possess the girl Mannette. Passion uncontrolled and untempered was the keynote of both roles, and it was presented in its deepest intensity with consummate skill and effectiveness. Noah Berry, jr., gave fine impersonation of Maniteekwa, an Indian, and Morris Burr was good in the role of Jacques Fachard, father of Mannette, although his dialect and his revival from the dead faint resulting from a gunshot wound, will doubtless improve with rehearsal. forest scene in the first act and the great snow storm which closes the act, are among the most impressive and realistic scenes of their kind ever shown in a play. The remaining two acts take quality. Special........... place in the log cabin of Burr Winton. The scenery was painted by Ernest Albert, and the scenery and mechanical effects were built by Burney McDonald. The play is laid in the far northwest, on the border line of British Columbia, and runs for about two and a half hours. Marc Klaw of the firm of Klaw & Erlanger came to Washington to witness the initial performances of the play and with Langdon McCormick, the author, and Thomas W.
